The CCITT makes recommendations for international communications. CCITT lists what are referred to as V and X recommendations. V standards apply to telephone circuits and modems. X standards apply to public data networks (PDNs). An example of the work of CCITT is the recommendation that X.25 has been adopted as a PDN standard. The X.25 communications protocol governs the way packets of data are transferred. (V.xx modem specs, X.25 protocol).

This is the unique number assigned to a Cash Receipt.

This is the process used to review, escalate, and dispose (approved or denied) any necessary changes made to project requirements.

The proposed change to a project requirement. It can be an additional requirement, removing a requirement, or changing a requirement. The information about the proposed change is captured on the Change Control Request form.

standard medium for storage of digital data in machine-readable form, accessible with a laser-based reader. CDs are 4-3/4 in diameter. CDs are faster and more accurate than magnetic tape for data storage: Faster, because even though data is generally written on a CD contiguously within each track, the tracks themselves are directly accessible. This means the tracks can be accessed and played back in any order. More accurate, because data is recorded directly into binary code; whereas magnetic tape requires data to be translated into analog form. In addition, extraneous noise (tape hiss) associated with magnetic tape is absent from CDs.

Federal

leverages cross-Enterprise Services competitive intelligence resources and links to Pan-HP resources to provide teams with insights on our key competitors including their strategies, tactics, performance, market size and competitive share. The CIC is focused on impacting sales performance and improving decision making through the increased understanding of each competitor's strategic intent, the development of winning pursuit strategies, and benchmarking performance.

HP

An IBM software system that provides the on-line user interface to MMIS data. This is the "front" end of the mainframe-based MMIS online system. CICS was originally developed to provide transaction processing for IBM mainframes. It controls the interaction between applications and users and lets programmers develop screen displays without detailed knowledge of the terminals used. It provides terminal routing, password security, transaction logging for error recovery and activity journals for performance analysis. CICS commands are written along with and into the source code of the applications, typically COBOL.

SVC technology drastically reduces network requirements and bandwidth consumed by traditional video solutions. This adaptive technology optimizes the user's video experience by delivering high quality video even under conditions of extremely low throughput. SVC also reduces latency often experienced with video connections and eliminates the need for expensive multipoint control units.
